INTRODUCTION

Zoning review can be a very bureaucratic process. It involves handling a lot of paper – site plans, special permits, subdivisions, appeals, building permits, certificates of compliance, and enforcement actions. Properly managing this paperwork and keeping it organized is often difficult, even in the best of circumstances, but it is essential to effective zoning administration and enforcement.

Paperwork must be located where municipal officials can find it – and even more importantly, where they can easily make it accessible to the public. Properly organizing paperwork will help to avoid the unnecessary delays and confusion that can result when records cannot be located, either during the review process or in the years subsequent to the action.

The advice in this publication should make the job of record-keeping easier, and should help a community achieve a record-keeping system that will be efficient and practical.

THE ESSENTIALS OF RECORD-KEEPING

The Importance of Filing. The statute of limitations for challenges to planning and zoning actions generally expires 30 days after a determination is filed.¹ This means that if records are not properly filed, the municipality may remain vulnerable to legal challenge for a longer time than necessary. Where a court finds that the municipality violated filing and/or record-keeping requirements, the validity of the final determination is placed at risk.

The Statutory Requirements. The New York planning and zoning enabling statutes contain filing requirements which must be followed precisely. For site plan reviews, special use permits, subdivision plats, and zoning appeals, the board's determination must be filed in the municipal clerk's office within five business days.²

What Constitutes Filing? A record is filed when it is placed under the control of the officer having responsibility for its custody. As regards zoning and planning determinations, this usually occurs when the document is presented to the municipal clerk at her office. But if the clerk is actually present in an official capacity when the board's determination is made, with the clerk's assent it could be placed "under her control" at that time--and would, therefore, be filed. If you are unsure whether your records are under the control of the clerk, check with your municipal attorney.

² Gen. City L. §§27-a(8), 27-b(6), 32(9), 81-a(9); Town L. §§274-a(8), 274-b(6), 276(9), 267-a(9); Vil. L. §§7-725-a(8), 7-725-b(6), 7-728(9), 7-712-a(9).

How Should Records be Filed? All records should be stamped with the date they are received by the municipal clerk. This will establish the date from which the 30-day statute of limitations is calculated. File records chronologically, but also according to the location of the property by tax parcel number, even if parallel filing methods are also used. A parallel system that is especially useful for boards of appeals involves filing records according to the section of the local zoning law that the appeal affected.

Why File by Location? Many times, it is extremely difficult for a person to remember the exact date that a board's determination occurred. Often the exact date is not relevant to the concern in question. But a person almost always knows, or can easily look up, the parcel location. Consider common reasons for people to search zoning records:

- a potential home buyer, or his attorney, researching the history of building permits and variances on a property to be purchased;
- a planning board looking into past variances on a site plan before the board;
- a zoning enforcement officer verifying violations of previously approved plans;
- a town assessor looking into improvements on a property being reassessed.

In all these cases, the location of the property is known. The dates of actions taken on these properties is, however, in all likelihood unknown, and impossible to determine without expending enormous time and effort searching chronologically through planning board, board of appeals, or building/zoning permit records.

Methods of Identifying Property Locations. A simple way to identify location is to use the tax parcel identification system. This is a ready-made filing system that is infinitely expandable. Each new subdivision of land creates new subcategories of numbers. It is a simple system and is readily available for use by public officials. By keeping all records tagged with the tax parcel identification number, it is easy to route every record to its correct file location.

Is More Than One Filing System Necessary? No. Although some communities may wish to segregate planning board, board of appeals and building/zoning permit records, there is no need to do so. The municipality should consider an integrated record system for both simplicity and comprehensiveness. Simplicity is the key to the effective working of most systems.

Using Checklists. Review authorities should use procedural checklists as a routine for all project reviews (see examples in the Appendix). These checklists help to: (1) keep the review authority aware of the necessary steps in the review process; and (2) provide a permanent record of the sequence and timing of actions taken, should the procedure be challenged later. These checklists should be tagged with both the tax parcel identification number as well as a chronological project log number for each project. Each decision-maker (enforcement officer, board, etc.)

should maintain a separate project log number sequence (e.g., 08-1, 08-2, 08-3, etc.). The checklist should be retained by the decision-maker, possibly in the form of a notebook. It will provide a permanent cross-referenced record of the location of the associated records in the municipal clerk's files.

CONCLUSION

It is important to follow the statutory filing requirements of state law, and file all records with the proper officer. File records chronologically, as well as by location using the tax parcel identification number, so that they may be more easily retrieved in the ensuing years. Boards of appeals should also file records by zoning law section. Always use checklists to keep track of project reviews, and to provide a permanent record of where files are located in the proper municipal office.
